There is much about the sea that animates our lives. From big things, like storms and tsunamis, to the small, like a childhood memory of the seashore recalled. The sea has its own rhythm, its own nature, yet it beckons us as the familiar embrace of an old and ancient love. And yet that familiar rhythm and nature seem somehow to whisper of something deeper and more mysterious that we must reverence, and that we dismiss or neglect at our peril.

We can learn much from the sea. Though literature, stories, and tales about the sea are predominantly masculine, there are quieter sources that speak to the feminine aspects of it. Reflected in the sea, we can glean insight into our lives as women—in small and large ways—as creatures with our own nature and rhythm, with depths and frivolities.

Our hope, as ever, is that all these pieces of daily life—the mundane, the trials, the triumphs—might be windows into the eternal.

FALL

St. Josemaria Escriva used the phrase “new Mediterraneans” to describe the process of going deeper into the interior life to discover new insights about what we already know or have already heard so many times before. There is a mysterious power of the mind unleashed when we “discover” something we already knew, when we contemplate truth from a new vantage point. These revelations, uncovered through prayer, then overflow into the rest of our lives. This process, aptly given a maritime-themed name, is one that reveals to us the depth and richness of the Faith. In meditating on the same stories, prayers, and Scripture, we can glean startling new windows into truth. What was familiar becomes suddenly deeper, broader. What was not new becomes so again and again as uncharted horizons are opened to us.

There is a tide in the affairs of men,
which taken at the flood,
leads on to fortune.

Omitted, all the voyage of their life
is bound in shallows and in miseries.
On such a full sea are we now afloat.
And we must take the current
when it serves, or lose our ventures.

—WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE—

Notes

The ocean is vast and unruly, yet still there is a marvelous sort of powerful obedience in the way the waves roll in and recede out, heeding the laws that govern it day after day.
